

Readiness for Organizational Change of Banking Sector – A Comparative Study of Public Sector and Private Sector Banks

DR.SK.MABUNNI AND PROF. T.SREENIVAS

Change is inevitable in the life of any organization. In today's business world, most of the organizations are facing a dynamic and changing business environment. Organizations that learn and cope with change will thrive and flourish, and others who fail to do so will be wiped out. Traditional bank business models are not supporting customer centricity. Banking channels remain segregated, by reorganizing their structures and procedures around the customer, banks can adapt quickly to the organizational change. The theme of this paper is to investigate the readiness for change on organizational change among the employees of Commercial Banks. Data were collected from 240 employees serving in the private and public sector banks through questionnaires. Simple Regression was performed to calculate the impact analysis. The findings of the study clearly show that there is a better understanding of the impact of Readiness for Change on Organizational Change. It is suggested that the banking sector must take measures to conduct a number of training programs and deliberations to improve the readiness for change among the employees in the banks to adapt to those changes, and enjoy the benefits emerging out of those changes.

INTRODUCTION

Many have predicted the fall of the traditional bank, as disruptive new entrants win share by offering a better customer experience through new products and channels. However, much of the landscape will change significantly in response to the evolving forces of customer expectations, regulatory requirements, technology, demographics, new competitors and shifting
